

Entrepreneurs eye the White House

A marketing message: Scrap the two-party system

Michael Jingoian

Age: 47

Business: AngelVision Technologies

Title: Founder and CEO

Campaign Web site: resetamerica.com

Michael Jingoian isn't kidding himself that he's ever going to become president. But he's using his campaign to publicize the concept of independent and third-party candidates in the American political system.

As founder of an 85-employee video marketing firm, AngelVision Technologies in Portland, Ore., Jingoian is skilled at getting his message to the masses. He thinks his nomination on the Libertarian Party ticket would help boost the Party's representation in future elections.

"If we can get more of the vote, then we can attract more legitimate candidates for the Senate outside of the two-party system," says Jingoian, who is an admirer of Republican presidential candidate Ron Paul.

COURTESY: RESET AMERICA

- A requiem for Ron Paul

Jingoian's campaign proposals include eliminating the departments of Education, Energy and Homeland Security; scrapping the Patriot Act; and reforming drug and prostitution laws to reflect the more liberal approaches of European countries such as Great Britain and Holland.

Being a small business owner is a distinct advantage in his campaign, says the baby-faced Jingoian: "I have real experience, not the kind of experience they talk about in Washington. My only downside is that I don't look my age."